Turkeys delight in warm weather, and for the chicks, it can never be too hot. Warm weather and long rambles along the pleasent fields and good for the growing brood. To be prefitable, turkeys make rapid growth, and to do this they should be kent on hearty food, and dry should be kept on hearty food, and dry and warm. A turkey hen never leads her brood across the open fields, exposed to the approach of every enemy, but steals cautiously and slowly along, with one eye on the alert for danger, while the pretty little creatures, sleek and downy, prattle and chatter, and look in every out of the way nook and corner for some concealed insect. They are immensely fond of spiders, and from the eagerness with they search and devour them, the morsel must be very sweet and good to their taste. When fully grown they will not scruple at swallowing a good sized snake. Turkeys will not bear confinement. Their habitude is the free open air and sunny fields. The mother hen always keeps her brood together with a soft, low cooing sound which they early learn and follow. She generally seeks deep grass and grain fields, wherein the young can hide from the attacks of overhanging hawks. A peculiar sound from the parent hen causes every chich to squat and hide in the tall weeds and grass. They remain thus secreted until assured from her that all danger is over, when the bright little creatures come forth with a happy flutter of glad wings. Turkeys are perhaps the most interesting in their shy, cunning ways, of all other domesti-cated birds. Their haunts are always pleasant and clean; in fact, turkeys will not thrive at all unless they are kept in a state of comparative cleanliness. They always seek the deepest grass, and trail through, and find the rankest and shadiest grain field. In the early part of the season they do not damage either grass or grain, other than tread it down; but latter, when corn and buckwheat kernel have become tempting, I would not care to be answerable for their depredations, still they will not thrive without their run. It on one's own premises, the damages is slight, if on a neighbor's, a provocation to anger. The bet-ter way is to limit their range, if possible, and train them to certain bounds.—American Poultry Journal.

Macaulay once bet and lost a copy of Paradise Lost" to Jeffrey on the correct rendering of a line in the poem. He then offered to bet another copy that Jeffrey could not catch him again on any line, and he won the bet, although the latter had the book open before him. Sir Robert Peel once said to Macaulay that he had never forgotten anything he wanted to remember, to which Macaulay retorted that he had never forgotten anything.
